SAND TRAP

There was nothing pleasant about the expressions on the faces of the three men as they rode deeper and deeper into Mexico. Each had the grim determination you see on the faces of desperate men. They were wanted on both sides of the Rio Grande and the reward money was high for them dead or alive. Each was well armed, carrying in addition to a Colt .44 a Winchester and a shot gun in scabbards on the sides of their horses. Slim Carey, Earl Kovar, and Jed Shedin realized that the sands of time were running out against them. Following them were two pack horses loaded with supplies — and in charge of the pack horses was an Indian mounted on a mule. His face was expressionless. Across his shoulder was an old blanket and his feet were bare. He carried neither gun nor knife for the three men did not trust him. At night when they slept they took turns at intervals watching El Viejo as he was known. The men stopped and soon a fire was going. They had coffee, bacon, and flap jacks for their meal.

"How much longer do we have to travel?" asked Earl Kovar. "It seems as though this could keep up forever."

"By tomorrow noon we should reach the village," replied Slim Carey. "Then we rest for a few days. El Viejo will get us a guide to take us to the mountains. Up there it is a combination of jungle and mountains."

"And you are sure we will get gold," interrupted the greedy voice of Jed Shedin. "Enough so we never have to work again"

"When did we ever work?" laughed Slim Carey. "Yes, there will be gold enough to last us the rest of our lives. Once we get it we head for Central America and then through South America until we get to Argentina. I know a fellow there who will help us buy ranches. Once there we split up."

They rested for an hour after their meal. The sun was blazing in the sky and the men felt lazy. Only the desire for the precious metal had kept them going day and night.

"How much would you say that gold idol was worth?" asked Earl Kovar. "Imagine a people that made everything out of gold."

"I was fourteen when I went with the trading expedition to Mexico," replied Slim Carey. "After we sold our goods my uncle left the rest of the men. Told me he was going to take me to an old Indian village. Now get this straight. Those Indians aren't like the kind we got in the states. Once these fellows had a tremendous civilization. Way up in those mountains they lived. They fought the Spaniards for years. Even now they don't speak a word of Spanish. That's why we need El Viejo. He understands their lingo.

So we came to this village. My uncle gave them some gifts .They were good to us. We saw this big gold idol in the house of the head man. They are governed by a council of old men who are called the HUEHUES. My uncle got them to understand he wanted to go up to the mountains and get gold from their secret treasure house. Before he left an old lady gave him the map. That's the map I always carried with me. We're going to get that gold.

When they approached the outskirts of the village, El Viejo rode ahead. He went straight to the house of the oldest man in the place. He spoke to Martinozo and told him the truth.

"They are cruel men. They will say they want to look for herbs. But they want gold. If we do not give them a guide it will be bad for us. They have an important document to show you. We want no trouble with the authorities. We wish to live in peace."

There were those who said Martinozo was so old that he could remember when Mexico was part of Spain. His wisdom had guided the villages through all kinds of situations.

"Let them come," he said. "They will destroy themselves for their motive is greed. They would not listen to the truth if we told it to them. So they shall talk and we shall listen."

El Viejo went back to his masters and told them that they would be welcomed. There was a grin on the face of cruel Jed Shedin.

"Just let them tell us we aren't welcome," he uttered as his right hand tapped the butt of his six shooter.

They came slowly to the house of Martinozo. He had sufficient time to summon some of the other elders of the village. They stood around the table at attention. This was the way they greeted the official from Mexico City on his annual visit. Slim Carey took a folded sheet of paper from his pocket. It was a time table of the Rio Grande Railroad. He handed it to Martinozo. The Indian looked at it and then gave it to the others. Then it was returned to Slim Carey. They were all impressed by the document and knew it must be important.

"You will be our guests," said Martinozo. "Our food consists of maize, fish, and sometimes birds that we trap. We are allowed no weapons. We have machetes but they are considered as tools."

They remained in the village for five days. El Viejo took them to a small house and showed them the idol.

"It is called TLAHUELILO or El Diablo," he informed them.

"It was a gift to them years ago from the governor of the province."

"A likely story," said Slim Carey. "Must have come from way up in the mountains. Tell the old man we want a guide. One who knows every inch of the ground. And you too must come with us because you speak his lingo."

A youth, El Joven, was selected to go with them. But El Viejo explained the problem in regard to transportation.

"You can't use horses, mules, or any other animals. We must carry all supplies on our backs."

That presented a problem of what to do with the rifles and shot-guns. But Earl Kovar had a sensible suggestion.

"We remove the firing pins. Then the weapons are useless. We will have to hide the supply of rifle and shot gun shells."

At the start of the next week the five men left on the trip. El Joven and El Viejo would talk in their native tongue. This soon got on the nerves of Jed Shedin.

"They could be planning something against us," he warned.

"El Joven doesn't speak English or Spanish so he has to talk that way to El Viejo. I tell El Viejo what to do in Spanish," replied Slim Carey. "We must keep cool. It is getting harder and harder to breath the higher up we go."

"Maybe he is taking us on a fool's errand," suggested Earl Kovar.

When he finished speaking he grabbed the youth by his arm. But there wasn't a change in El Joven's expression.

"Let him alone now," ordered Slim Carey. "We have ways to make him talk if he tries to double cross us."

They approached the jungle area with caution. For they knew they could easily be separated and lost. El Viejo chopped a way through the dense vegetation with his machete. When night came, the men were really frightened.

"For two cents I'd call it all off," said Earl Kovar. "We are in a tight spot. If our guides vanish, what happens to us? I don't think we could get out of this place. Or even find our way back over the mountains. There wasn't a trail to follow here."

Slim Carey unholstered his six gun. He aimed at the youth's feet and pulled the trigger. Nothing happened. Five more times he pulled the trigger. All were duds. The two other men nervously unholstered their revolvers and went into action. But with no results. They checked their guns and everything seemed O.K. Finally Slim Carey forced the bullet head off one of the cartridges and poured out the contents of the shell. It was sand!

They would never know that while they slept silent feet came into their room. Silent and efficient hands working with rude tools emptied the cartridges that had been quietly removed from the cartridge belts. The Indians were following the letter of the law:

They must never attack, shoot, or wound a white man!

In a fraction of a second, El Viejo and El Joven dashed for freedom. The dried corn they carried concealed on their persons would sustain them for days.

"We may never get out of here alive," moaned Slim Carey for the understatement of the year.

Colonel Juan Batisto made the long trip to the village accompanied by a group of soldiers. He listened carefully to the stories of the elders and to what El Viejo had to say. They turned over to him the animals, supplies and rifles and shot-guns left behind.

"No doubt they were the three men we had been trailing," he said. "The fools! They should have known some history. Your people never had gold. Your civilization was built on maize."

Colonel Juan Batisto walked over to the idol. It seemed to have an insolent look on his face. Slowly he lifted the heavy object and looked at the inscription on the bottom: "William Stevens, Boston, 1854." Then walked away from the plated brass idol.
